Introduction

Throughout Rwanda, women engaged in sex work are a particularly vulnerable group. They are marginalized, underserved, and heavily affected by HIV and other Sexually Transmitted Infections (STIs). According to the Rwanda Biomedical Centre, an estimated 51% of women engaged in sex work in Rwanda have HIV¹. This figure is more than 17 times higher than the HIV prevalence rate of 3% in the Rwandan general population². It is estimated that female sex workers (FSWs) contribute up to 46% of new HIV infections in Rwanda, while their clients could contribute to 9-11% of new infections³.

The Government of Rwanda has recognized women engaged in sex work as a key population for addressing HIV and has prioritized this group in the National Strategic Plan on HIV and AIDS 2013-2018. However, the current criminalization of sex workers and their clients is impeding these efforts by increasing women's vulnerability to HIV, ill-health, and rights violations⁴.

This policy brief analyses the barriers created by the Penal Code in responding to HIV and the potential human rights violations sex workers face. This policy brief recommends the amendment of the Penal Code.

Criminalization of prostitution (Sex work)

Article 205 of the Penal Code reads as follows : "Any person who engages in prostitution shall fulfill, for a period not exceeding one year, one or more of the following obligation:

1. Not to leave territorial limits determined by the Court;
2. Not to go to certain places determined by the Court;

3. To be subjected to surveillance measures;
4. To seek medical treatment;
5. To periodically report to administrative services or authorities determined by the Court.

Violations of these obligations as determined by the court can result in a term of imprisonment for 3-6 months. The penalties of this paragraph also apply to anyone caught having sexual intercourse with a prostitute.

Criminalization of sex work and vulnerability to HIV infection: an evidence linkage

Evidence shows that, in countries where sex work is criminalized, women are more vulnerable to HIV and other Sexually Transmitted Infections (STIs) – both through their direct engagement in sex work and through partners who are clients of sex workers. Indeed, criminalization of sex work forces underground men and women engaged in sex work⁵, limits condom use due to rushed transactions and fear of carrying condoms⁶, hinders vulnerable women from reporting and seeking services for sexual violence⁷, and causes a lack of medical prevention and treatment among the key population.

These are also true for Rwanda, where the prevalence rate of HIV among women engaged in sex work is 51% - more than 17 times higher than that of the general population⁸.

Furthermore, it is estimated that female sex workers contribute up to 46% of new HIV infections in Rwanda, while their clients contribute to 9-11% of new infections⁹.

Broad framing of the penal code: a potential barrier to service providers

Article 212 criminalizes aiding, abetting, and protecting prostitution. The article states that “any person, who in anyway, knowingly aids, abets or protects or solicits prostitution” is liable to imprisonment for 6 to 24 months and/or a fine of 500,000 to 1,000,000 RWF.

The broad interpretation of article 212 of the Penal Code can lead to the prosecution of organizations involved in HIV prevention and treatment. Such potential prosecution will lead to decreased access to HIV related services for sex workers as organizations and individuals who are involved in the provision of HIV prevention and treatment will refuse to offer services to avoid prosecution.

Criminalization of sex work increases women’s vulnerability to rights violations

As stated in the preamble of the Rwandan Constitution of 2003, revised in 2015, the People of Rwanda are “committed to building a State governed by the rule of law, based on the respect for human rights, freedom and on the principle of equality of all Rwandans before the law as well as equality between men and women”. This commitment is evident throughout the Constitution as well as through the ratification of numerous international and regional human rights treaties by the Government of Rwanda. As such, every Rwandan is entitled to protection from discrimination, the highest attainable standard of health, privacy, liberty and security, freedom of movement, protection from forced labour, child labour and trafficking, and all other human rights.

The Government of Rwanda recognizes its obligation to respect, protect, fulfill, and promote rights enshrined in the Constitution and the human rights instrument to which it is a party. When sex work is criminalized, however, men and women engaged in sex work are more subject to human rights violations than when sex workers and their clients are not criminalized¹⁰.

In particular, article 205 of the current Penal Code violates:

- The right to dignity¹¹, by subjecting women engaged in sex work to measures of surveillance, breaching their right to privacy¹²;
- The right to equal protection of the law¹³ and the right to non-discrimination¹⁴, by creating restrictions and obligations for women engaged in sex work that are not applicable to their clients or perpetrators of other sexual related crimes, such as child defilement, rape and marital rape;
- The right to equal protection of the law, by omitting to determine that a person has to be found guilty by the court before being subjected to measures of surveillance and mandatory health seeking;
- The right to bodily integrity¹⁵, by putting vulnerable women at an increased risk of sexual violence including rape, from police, clients and strangers; and
- The right to liberty and security of person¹⁶, by subjecting vulnerable women to arbitrary arrest and unlawful arrest

Decriminalizing sex work could avert
33-46% of new HIV
infections

Decriminalization of sex work: a step to ending HIV

Those who support the criminalization of sex work might argue that it is a deterrent from engaging in sex work and thus could prevent them. However, there is evidence that decriminalizing sex work does not increase the number of women engaged in sex work¹⁷. International modeling has shown that decriminalizing sex work could avert 33-46% of new infections¹⁸ suggesting that decriminalization could have public health advantages. In addition, decriminalization of sex work creates a conducive environment where female sex workers can report without fear cases of sexual violence, including rape perpetrated against them, thus making possible the prosecution of sexual violence.

Conclusion and recommendations

As demonstrated above, the criminalization of women engaged in sex work and their clients is a major public health and human rights concern. Rwanda is a country that can pride itself on the gains made in development, gender equality, and health and human rights. To continue on this path, the Government of Rwanda has prioritized women engaged in sex work, as well as their clients, as a key population in the national response to HIV- the National Strategic Plan on HIV and AIDS 2013-2018 that sets out several direct interventions for FSWs and their clients. It is evident that the Government of Rwanda does not wish to create barriers for HIV prevention.

Health Development Initiative (HDI), Great Lakes Initiative for Human Rights and Development (GLIHD), and Ihorere Munyarwanda Organisation (IMRO) call upon the government of Rwanda to consider the following when reviewing the current penal code:

- Decriminalizing the act of engaging in prostitution (sex work) and the act of having sexual intercourse with a prostitute by repealing article 205 of the current penal code as a critical contribution to advancing public health and human rights in Rwanda.
- Amend articles 207 and 212 of the penal code to ensure that they do not pose potential barriers or obstacles for services providers working with sex workers/ prostitute and their clients within the framework of public health.
- Criminalizing human trafficking, sexual exploitation and child defilement.
